“No Future Chaos?” was the weird punk manifesto of the seventies.

Nonsense, the future is neither written nor anticipated by any prophet of doom however young.

There is no such thing as a predictable future except in the hearts of a generation of mutant teenagers.

Quite a few of them, the best of them consider leaving Europe for what they expect to be a better future elsewhere. Young European Jews are leaving for Israel or America by the thousands whereas millions of young Africans, Syrians dream of a future in Europe. All sorts of diasporas are heading for Europe. The dramatic question sounds: how do Europe’s youngsters see their future? Put in simpler words, what do Europe’s eyes actually see? Europe’s eyes can see a high degree of frustration, even desperation across the old continent and pessimism all over, less hope and fewer opportunities than in their parents’ youth.

Put in a nutshell, they can see doom all over: dark clouds with virtually no silver lining.

Therefore they question the legitimacy of policy makers, newsmakers and money makers. This generation is one of sceptics, neither left nor rightwing but definitely realistic and matter of fact, better and faster informed mutants that are more connected than any generation before theirs. Their main frustration lies in their isolation within their national borders and ghetto communities.

These invisible cultural walls that resulted in the past in so many national wars and regional conflicts in Europe must be dismantled and swiftly turned into bridges.

Nationalities, languages and religions do separate and tear apart even this first generation ever to be connected on social networks where they communicate, interact and learn from each other often in pidgin English.

Eyes of Europe wants to teach them proper English and help them interact and debate more effectively in real time on all sorts of issues linked to their own future and that of the planet, linked to the survival of Europe's Civilization and ethics and that of the human species. They are the first generation of self-learners ever to have almost total access to the treasures of human knowledge. They are Europe's future but are very little aware of it yet. It is Eyes of Europe endeavor and mission to help them grow by getting them to communicate and interact systematically with each other in real time on all possible European issues (violence, immigration, climate change, growth, diversity...) both individually (how to live a better life, how to think, learn, love eat differently) and collectively: how to become gradually a well-informed and critical European opinion and so doing grow gradually into such thing as a European people aware and proud of its European roots, past, history and values.

Eyes of Europe is an interactive auto-active (self-learning) platform that urges mutant teenagers to communicate and teach each one another with the help of all possible electronic means. E.o.E.'s ambition is to help them discover, understand and love Europe with the support of a team of well trained teachers/guides/moderators, a bunch of brilliant intellectuals who have been trained in group communication.

Eyes of Europe is intuiting the future of Europe. Eyes of Europe likes to be thought of as "Youngsters' Identity Manifesto for a better Future", which reads YIM: Why I Am.
